Galea, Angela Kaida, Lori A. Brotto, and Manish Sadarangani. The abstract states that the success of any COVID-19 vaccine program ultimately depends on high vaccine uptake and that the study determined overall intention to receive a COVID-19 vaccine and identified factors that predict intentions to be vaccinated against COVID-19 in Canada. The methods describe an online survey based on validated scales and theoretical frameworks to explore intention to receive a COVID-19 vaccine, with two multivariable logistic regression models conducted to determine factors.

Abstract

Background: The success of any COVID-19 vaccine program ultimately depends on high vaccine uptake. This study determined overall intention to receive a COVID-19 vaccine and identified factors that predict intentions to be vaccinated against COVID-19 in Canada, specifically in key priority groups identified by the American Committee on Immunization Practice (ACIP) and the National Advisory Committee on Immunization (NACI) for early immunization.

Methods: Individuals from research cohorts from the general population of British Columbia aged 25–69 were invited complete an online survey based on validated scales and theoretical frameworks to explore intention to receive a COVID-19 vaccine. Two multivariable logistic regression models were conducted to determine factors

Mindful Parenting in Mental Health Care

Susan M. Bögels · Annukka Lehtonen · Kathleen Restifo

Published online: 25 May 2010
© The Author(s) 2010. This article is published with open access at Springerlink.com

Abstract Mindfulness is a form of meditation based on the Buddhist tradition, which has been used over the last two decades to successfully treat a multitude of mental health problems. Bringing mindfulness into parenting (“mindful parenting”) is one of the applications of mindfulness. Mindful parenting interventions are increasingly being used to help prevent and treat mental disorders in children, parenting problems, and prevent intergenerational transmisdysfunctional parenting schemas and habits; (5) increasing self-nourishing attention; and (6) improving marital functioning and co-parenting. We review research that has applied mindful parenting in mental health settings, with a focus on evidence for these six mechanisms. Finally, we discuss directions for future research into mindful parenting and the crucial questions that this research should strive to answer.
